Not illustrated. 1911 Excerpt: ... out of the five, are grossly unjust to the larger centers of population. When we come to consider the upper house, moreover, we shall see how New Jersey and Maryland offend in this branch of the Legislative system. The imperviousness of these little communities to the dominant theory of representation is good empirical proof of the importance of mere superficial area as a factor in the development of political institutions. Whether the dominant theory is itself beyond criticism we need not here enquire. To those who regard the ignorant vote of the great cities as a menace, it will not appeal; the fact that in a few crevices and crannies of the Union the rural population is so safely entrenched should be to these a cause of rejoicing. A majority of the population--perhaps because of their ignorance--will rejoice, rather, that the crannies and crevices are so few. To these, the attempt to enforce equal representation must seem a praiseworthy adherence to the Republican principle, as always understood. They will recall with wonder the distrust once felt as to the possible permanence of Republics of large size, and will feel that in the very largeness of our other States has lain their comparative salvation. Without entering into this controversy, this much, at least, may safely be said. Between little States, and little faith in the equal capacity of all men for self-government, some inherent harmony seems to exist. We shall see that discrimination against urban centers is by no means confined to these small States. But broad belief in the people colors most vividly the institutions of those States which cover the broadest expanse of territory. II. OBLIGATORY PERIODIC
